ABSTRACT

The adaptive audible alert volume control process automatically adjusts the volume of a telephone's alert tone by sampling the ambient sound level at the time a call is received. When the telephone receives a call indication from the system, it samples the ambient sound level through the telephone's microphone. The sampled ambient sound level is then compared to at least one threshold to determine a volume at which to set the alert tone.